

there. Others are going out, loaded with articles to be sold in distant countries.

4. Besides the great ships and steamers, little steamboats are constantly moving up and down the river, like stages, to take passengers from one part of the long city to another; while others carry people back and forth, across the stream. Along its banks, are great warehouses for storing goods, and miles of wharves and docks, to furnish room for loading and unloading the vessels.

5. In other parts of the city, are large, beautiful parks. One, which is very fine, has the queen's palace looking down upon it. There are many splendid palaces, many grand old churches, and famous public buildings, that you would like to see.

6. Manchester is another great city of England, though it is not nearly so large as London. You will see here a multitude of cotton factories, with great smoking chimneys. The whole city seems filled with them; and a large part of the people are in some way concerned in them. These mills make the beautiful calicoes and muslins which are used all over England, and are also packed in boxes, and sent by shiploads to all parts of the world.

7. Liverpool is another important city. It is near Manchester, on the seashore. Until lately, all the trade by sea with Manchester passed through its port. But now, Manchester is itself connected with the ocean by a ship canal, so that it is able to send away and receive cargoes without being obliged to depend on Liverpool. There are very many other cities in England about which you will like to learn at another time; and there are so
